CROQUETTES

BY CORNELIA C. BEDFORD.

When on economic thoughts intent and after a thorough survey of the subject, it seems to me that there is no more acceptable way of serving left-overs than in the form of croquettes. Many persons have the idea that they are difficult of preparation and frequent failures are likely to occur. On the contrary, when the principles of the making have once been mastered it will be found one of the easiest and most satisfactory of

While fresh meat is frequently used for a dish of croquettes for a course meal to invited guests it seldom happens in the average household that meat has to be especially cooked for this purpose. Should there be a scarcity of any one kind of meat there may be scraps of another kind which will blend with it in flavor; or when the total amount is less than is needed the deficiency can be made up by the addition of rice, hominy or some vegetable, either fresh or starchy, stale bread crumbs and chopped, cold macaroni being equally acceptable. No scraps of any kind need be rejected providing their flavor harmonizes with that of the other ingredients.

The basis of all croquette mixtures is a thick sauce, either white or brown. This may be made especially or a portion so made and added to any thick sauce in the pantry, such as one made with stock of some kind or a good tomato sauce

To make this basic sauce put into a saucepan one-quarter of a cupful (two tablespoonfuls or two ounces of butter and let it slowly melt. When bubbling, stir in a quarter of a cupful of flour (two tablespoonfuls or one ounce) and stir till mixed, then cook gently without browning for three minutes. Gradually add a half pint of milk-preferably scalding hot-stirring until the mixture thickens smoothly. Add a half teaspoonful of salt and a quarter of a teaspoonful of white pepper and cook slowly for five minutes longer, then take from the fire. Add to this a pint of the desired meat, which before measuring has been passed through the fod chopped. Season well according to the meat used. Cover closely and put aside in a cool place, thus insuring that no skin forms over the surface while cooling. When in a hurry the mixture must be spread over a greased platter in order to facilitate the precess. The colder it is the easier it will be to mold into shape,

It should be said right here that the meat used should first be looked over carefully and all pieces of gristle and coarse fat discarded. Then, after cutting into pieces of convenient size it can be passed through the food chopper. A small piece of ham, a slice or two of cooked bacon, etc., will in most cases add to the final mixture.

As regards seasoning that is dependent upon the mixture itself. Onion juice, lemon juice, chopped parsley, chopped celery, curry powder, ground spices—any or all may be added ac-cording as the mixture warrants or taste dictates. Croquettes with a base of chicken or other meat of a like delicate flavor, would need much less than those made with mutton, cooked liver,

When the prepared mixture is cold and ready for shaping have ready a board or large platter, a saucer flour, four times as many fine dry bread crumbs as you expect to use and an egg broken in a shallow saucer, mixed with a tablespoonful of warm water and beaten just enough with a fork to break the stringiness. Take a tablespoonful of the mixture-if wanted rather small, a level spoonful; with the hands lightly mold it into any desired shape, flattening the ends. Should the mixture prove sticky the hands may be either slightly greased or floured, the latter is usually the better. Gently lay each croquette in the saucer of egg and with a spoon dip the liquid over it until no spot is left bare. up carefully on a broad bladed knife, allow all superfluous egg to drain off, then drop into the heap of dry crumbs and roll until evenly coated and quite dry, then set aside on a flat surface. Proceed in this way until all have been shaped, egged and crumbed. When the croquette mixture is a very consistent one this may be done several hours before they are to be fried. For the frying use a deep saucepan or kettle of heavy material and have the fat in it at least an inch deeper than the height of the croquettes, thus providing for their thorough immersion. Place it over the fire to heat slowly. When at last it is so hot that a blue smoke arises not only from the edges but the center as well it is probably hot enough. Test by dropping in small piece of bread. If it browns in forty seconds the fat is at the proper degree of heat. It is best to use some form of a wire basket, as this allows the cooking of a number of croquettes at one time. First dip the basket in the fat that the wires may be greased; arrange in it from three to five croquettes, never more than this, or the fat will be cooled too much. Low-er the basket into the fat. At first there will be a sharp sputtering as cold and hot materials touch. Raise the basket for a second until the splutter subsides, then again lower the basket until the croquettes are submerged. They should brown in a minute or less. Lift them up, slightly tilt the basket that the fat may drain off well, then gently turn the croquettes out on some soft, unglazed paper, laid on a flat pan. When drained transfer to another freshly papered pan and let stand in the open oven until all have been fried. While this first lot is draining have the fat over the hottest part of the fire that it may again be heated to the proper temperature before frying another basketful. The rules for meat croquettes apply also to those made with fish, except that one or more egg yolks are added just before the flaked cooked fish is turned in; other proportions-one of sauce to two of meat-are the same; a little acid, lemon juice or vinegar, is usually sprinkled over the fish to accentuate its taste.

Besides croquettes made of meat and fish, there may be a basis of cooked vegetables chopped fine, while of the starchy vegetables we give a special recipe or two. Boil sufficient sweet potatoes to make, when skinned and mashed fine, one pint. Season well with salt and pepper, add one teaspoonful of butter and work it in thoroughly, then add a tablespoonful of chopped parsley. As soon as cool enough to handle form into croquettes, egg and crumb them and fry.

For white potato croquettes boil and put through the ricer enough white potatoes to make one pint. Add one teaspoonful of butter, two tablespoonfuls of rich cream, salt and pepper to taste, one teaspoonful of onior juice, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley and the beaten yolks of two eggs. Turn into a saucepan and stir over a slow fire until the mixture forms in a ball in the center of the saucepan, then cool and finish as for other croquettes.
